The analytes may be biological analytes such as proteins, or otherwise. The invention also relates to methods of treatment of a sample to remove interfering species. The interfering species is not necessarily charged and may not contain analytes. The invention also relates to apparatus for analysis of a sample containing a first interfering species. Such analysis may be done using an optical technique, and the invention also relates to methods and apparatus for optical analysis using at least one optical filter. Conventionally, when one wishes to analyze a sample containing one or more analytes (for example proteins) by optical analysis, the sample is treated with one or more reagents. Such reagents may be: fluorescent tagging reagents such as FITC and DYLight, PA1 immunostaining reagents such as phycoerythrin, or PA1 chemical reagents such as reducing agents or heat treatments. PA1 screening means capable of screening at least one light source and determining whether the at least one light source emits a signal in the range of components including an analyte; and PA1 means for returning the at least one light source to the first mode of operation in response to a determination that the at least one light source emits a signal which is not a component of the range of components including an analyte. PA1 providing a light source or plurality of light sources; PA1 providing an optical filter or a plurality of optical filters, each filter having a wavelength characteristic; and PA1 continuously sampling and passing a beam of light from the light source through the filter(s), wherein the filter(s) are selected to pass a component of the analyte light but to block one or more other components of light, so that the sample light beam is passed through the filter(s) and contains at least one analyte
